MORE FEARSOME THAN SPIDER-MAN AND SPIDER-WOMAN COMBINED!

The character of Spider Widow was unique among all costumed heroines from the Golden Age of Comics. Most were beautiful young women who put on tight fitting costumes that made them hotter than ever. Not so Dianne Grayton, the wealthy young socialite who donned the guise of Spider Widow. She decided to adopt the iconography of the most powerful and terrifying of all female archetypes: the hideous old witch of story and legend. Making her face up a wrinkled, wartish green, with high beaked nose, stringy gray hair, peaked black hat and black robe, Spider Widow really did strike fear, or at the very least masculine unease, into evildoers who beheld her. One glimpse of her face was enough to send bad guys (and gals) running. The name Spider Widow was derived from the fact that Dianne Grayton possessed the strange power of clouding the minds of Black Widow spiders and compelling them to do her bidding – which was generally to bite baddies. A hideous old hag who could unleash clouds of poisonous arachnids was enough to arouse terror in the hearts of even the most hardened of malefactors. Spider Widow was a short lived series, rarely reprinted, running in Feature Comics from issue #57 (June 1942) to #72 (June 1943).

Spider Widow was the brain child of artist/writer Frank Borth. Borth began penciling comics in 1941. His debut work appeared in Timely Publishing's (today Marvel Comics) Daring Mystery Comics. In Kindle Page View.
